Findings

- 1
- Client Home was understood as a “summary” of the buyer’s home search. Straightforward and did what they believed it should do.
- 2
- Participants were unclear about the 'Feed.' They didn’t realize it displayed listing updates rather than all listings or saved ones. It also wasn’t clearly distinct from Client Home or Notifications (which were not covered in this study).
- 3
- Triaging options at the listing-card level were generally sufficient, though some participants felt a 'maybe' option could help with narrowing down choices. Others described a two-step review process: first filtering out 'not interested' listings, then ranking the remaining ones into top- and second-tier groups. In that context, a 'maybe' option wasn’t seen as necessary.
- 4
- In-app communication was once again viewed as especially valuable and a key differentiator.
